40% of Japanese women in their 30s and early 40s don't exercise at all
From The Japan Times, October 15, 2024, edited for academic purposes

A 2023 Japan Sports Agency survey found that about 40% of women in their 30s and early 40s don't exercise, likely due to being busy with work or child-rearing. Only 30-40% of women in their 30s and 40s exercise at least once a week, leading to a decline in athletic ability, including speed, flexibility, and endurance.

In contrast, around 60% of men in their 20s and 50% in their 30s and 40s exercise weekly. The survey gathered data from over 59,000 people between ages 6 to 79, revealing a 10-year decline in women's athletic performance, especially those in their 40s.

The agency plans initiatives to promote exercise among working adults and parents, particularly women, to counter this trend. Efforts include collaborations with businesses, local governments, and other agencies to improve public health and extend healthy life expectancy through sports.

第4問 次の英文を読み、(28)～(32)の質問に答えなさい。

How a new flock of bird-watchers is contributing to science

From The Japan Times, February 11, 2024, edited for academic purposes

Bird-watching is more thrilling than it seems and plays a key role in understanding bird behaviors and helping conservation efforts. By observing birds, you can notice changes in the environment, like why some birds have disappeared while new species have appeared.

Members of the Wild Bird Society of Japan carry bird-themed accessories and checklists to record sightings. After each trip, they share notes and publish their findings. Hobbyist bird-watchers help gather important data for researchers who are in short supply.

During bird-watching, excitement builds when a rare bird is spotted. The birds become easier to notice, and their movements and calls start standing out. Watching birds closely reveals their beauty and details — like heart-shaped feathers or orange colors like shrine gates. Shimada compares bird-watching to discovering a new world.

In Japan, bird-watching has long roots. In the Edo Period, bird-keeping was popular, but in the 20th century, Godo Nakanishi promoted observing birds instead of capturing them. Today, apps like Merlin Bird ID and eBird allow bird-watchers to easily record their findings, and this data helps researchers study bird populations and migration patterns.

Bird-watching has become more popular and accessible, attracting a diverse crowd. Shimada says bird-watching expanded his world and made him more connected to nature, but he also worries about the birds' future. Changes in migration patterns could signal environmental issues. He hopes to pass on the joy of bird-watching and conservation to future generations.
